non-members there is an entrance fee for castle grounds and parking. There has been a castle here for a thousand years and the Croft family has been associated with the history of this part of the Marchlands throughout this time. The main part of the castle dates from late 14th century and belonged to the Croft family. In 1746, the property passed to Richard Knight, the son of a Shropshire ironmaster, but was repurchased by the Croft family in 1923. St Michael's church dates from about 1300.

Follow the track round to the left and then uphill to the stile and the gate (8). The path now goes slightly left to a small clump of old chestnut and oak trees, before continuing uphill. Walk to the top of the field, keeping the hedge to the right. On this hillside there is a line of very old chestnut trees, some of which have died, but remain attractive in their skeletal shapes. Over to the left the views to the Black Mountains and the Brecon Beacons open up. At the top of the field go through the large gate on the left, cross the grass to the next gate, keeping the fence on your right and walk on to the next gate and stile. Follow the wide grass path that runs along the edge of the woodland. When the path forks, after about a third of a mile, take the right hand track, to continue straight on through the woods. Eventually the path bends to the right and then goes uphill. Follow this up until you reach the gravelled track. Turn right along this. After about 200 yards, take the grass track to the left. Ladyacre Plantation is to your right and Yatton Hill on the left. Follow the grass track until you reach the path that crosses at right angles. Turn left and go down, slightly, to the gate and stile (9). (To the left is a narrow track that runs back along the edge of Yatton Hill. There are seats along this track and it is possible to see peregrine falcons, buzzards and ravens, as they hunt along this edge.)

From the gate and stile, cross the stile on the right and follow the grass track, keeping to the left, leading up to the top of Croft Ambrey, an Iron Age hill fort. The path gradually winds its way up, and round, passing through several of the ramparts and ditches that were once part of the defence system of the fort. Having twisted back on itself, the path comes out on the top of the fort, to give a 360° view (10).

The Iron Age hill fort, the oldest of the 30 hill forts in Herefordshire is thought to date from 1050 BC. It was extended in 450 BC and again in 390 BC. Occupation finally ended in 48 AD. The fort covers 32 acres and from the top you can see, below, some of the ramparts and ditches that encircled this triangular shape. Because the hill is so well wooded it is difficult to appreciate the nature of the hill fort from a distance. When the top five acres were

The Ramblers

The Ramblers is Britain's biggest charity working to promote walking and improve conditions for all walkers. In Herefordshire there are four groups: Hereford, Mortimer, Ross-on-Wye and Leaddon Vale.

excavated in the 1960s, it was established that here, there had been a row of rectangular buildings. Some very fine metal work plus pottery was excavated. The population of Herefordshire at that time was engaged in farming and the size of this fort indicates that large number of people lived in the area.

Immediately to the north is the Leinthall Earls stone quarry. Beyond the quarry, you can see the Wigmore Rolls and the Shropshire Hills; Clee Hill lies further east; then round to the Malvern Hills. To the south, across the Herefordshire Plain, the Sugar Loaf and the Skirrid can be seen, while westwards are the Black Mountains and the Brecon Beacons. The Marchlands show up very well from here. Continue along the top, going east, down to the stile, go right to the gate and then down the wide stretch of grass to the path below. Follow this to the left, up through the woods, of Langham Vallet to the next gate. Go through the gate, straight on to the next gate and go right on to the top of Bircher Common (11). This is Whiteway Head. This was one of the trade routes for transporting salt. Several of the manors in Herefordshire had salt pans in Droitwich

Go down and over to the left, to Oaker Coppice and follow down round the edge of the woodland to its lowest point, then continue down slightly left to where you parked. ■
